"So soon, John?" she sighed. "Yes, darling, I'm afraid I must go." Then, seeing protest hovering on her lips, he repeated: "Must go-really must! Though, you know, I'd give ten years of my life to be with you for another hour!"

Her eyes were full of questioning. So, John, as he stooped down to implant a farewell kiss, tenderly added:

"But tomorrow I will stay for quite a long time. You see, there's a meeting of our lodge tonight, and I shall be fined a quarter if I'm late."

BRIEF BITS OF WILD LIFE Pigeon the Victim of Hawk-Young Rabbits in Imminent Danger From Their Many Enemies,

Scene of a little tragedy. On a bit of ground plowed last fall, a sprinkle of small feathers showed where a pigeon had been devoured. That it had been done by a hawk, not a crow, was shown by the few kernels of corn which the crop had contained, lying untouched.

Found a nest containing three young abbits in the field. The mother, selecting a small hollow, deposits her young therein, first lining it with fur plucked from her own coat, and covering all over with a bunch of the same. So long as the grass, or rather weeds, stood they were well protected, but mower and rake had both passed over, carried away the crop, and done no further harm beyond dragging the fur to one side, thus giving a clew to the nursery. I looked in at them, then introduced a finger. Until this was done they were still as if dead, but soon as the touch of alien flesh was felt they began successively to kick with startling violence. Too young to run (they were about the size of large mice, and probably but a day or two old), this must have been to terrify the intending captor. The coat was thick and rather darker than the adult's; ears, paws and tail yellow and bare; the eyes closed, like those of young kittens. Covering them up, I departed, but when last seen they were trying to kick off the blankets. Their fate seemed very uncertain. Such choice morsels for dog, crow or hawk can hardly escape. Seemingly they would have been safer in the thicket close by, but I suppose maternal instinct may be trusted.-From a Farmer's Note Book," by C. E. D. Phelps.

One-Time Owner of Prodigiously Valuable Oil Land Surely Has a Kick Coming.

"That good luck and bad luck go hand in hand in the oil business is demonstrated in the case of Fred Boston, who is now tending bar in a Joplin, Mo., saloon at a salary of $10 a week," said J. S. Cook, an Oklahoma oil operator, at the Shoreham, accordng to the Washington Post.

"When the Indian Territory Oil company, which had a blanket lease on the Osage nation lands, was forced by financial necessity to sublet part of its holdings," continued Mr. Cook, "Boston was given a sublease on a section abutting on the Arkansas river, near Cleveland, Okla. He was unable to develop his lease, and sold a half interest in his deal to H. V. Foster, president of the Indian Territory company, who always held out a helping hand to the little fellows. But bad days came to the parent company, and neither Boston nor Foster could develop the 640 acre tract, and, as a last resort, the lease was sold to the Gipsy Oil company. "This company began to drill in the spring of 1913, and late last summer a gusher was struck. 'Producers' followed one another, and what is now known as the Boston pool became the wonder of the oil world. The lease which Boston parted from for a paltry few hundred dollars cannot now be estimated in value, and the value of one hour's production exceeds Boston's salary for an entire year."

Curious Custom.

The custom known as "Whuppitty Scorie" was celebrated by the youth of Lanark, Scotland, recently, when the bell in the town's steeple rang out for the first time at 6 o'clock after a five months' silence. From March 1 to September 30 of each year the bell rings for some minutes at 6 p. m., but during the remainder of the year it remains silent. On the occasion of the ringing of the bell for the first time the young people gather at the cross, each carrying a stringed cap in his hand. When the bell tolls the boys run in procession round the parish church. They do this three times and then a rush is made for New Lanark, for the purpose of meeting the boys of that village to engage in combat, the weapons used being the stringed caps.
